

How to Navigate Our Traditions in a Changing World

Years ago, when my wife and I lived in New York, we never hosted a large family Thanksgiving dinner because we simply couldn't — our place was way too small. It was just my wife, our daughter, and myself, so we'd get a smaller bird, like a Cornish hen from Staubitz Market on Court Street. When we first moved out of Brooklyn to New Jersey, we began to host Thanksgivings for friends and family. As our celebrations grew, so did the bird and now we get a full-sized turkey.

Probably the biggest difference between our current Thanksgivings and years ago in New York is that with our three kids, it's a lot noisier now! Our family hosts a different cast of characters every year, depending on who can come. We've had a variety of family members and even friends from New York who don't mind the colder Minnesota weather and long shopping lines on Black Friday (we won't be sad to see those disappear this year...). We always have an open invitation to family and close friends who want to celebrate with us.

This year, we have no idea whether the pandemic will calm down in time for Thanksgiving. We hope that we can host this year, but there's a chance we won't. It's made me think about how much I enjoy the simple things about Thanksgiving.

One of my favorite parts of Thanksgiving is Thursday morning. I usually get up and go play an hour or two of tennis with some friends. By the time I'm back home, we usually settle in for a quiet day with the kids who are celebrating no school for the day. Usually, we make a big batch of grilled cheese sandwiches and soup and watch football. As the day goes on, the slow cooker gets turned on for some Brussels sprouts with bacon and the pressure cooker does its magic on some local wild rice to go inside the turkey. And of course, someone ends up drawing the short straw and gets to peel all the potatoes.

For the kids, they are hoping we'll see some snow again this Thanksgiving weekend. Last year, they had a sleepover with one of their cousins and were up and ready to get on the sledding hill by about 6:03 a.m. Even though nobody can guarantee snow on Thanksgiving, it's certainly something the kids are going to be looking out for.

It's a wonderful, relaxing day full of low-level activity, and we'll probably still get to have that this year. The moments that make us happiest don't always have to be the biggest or busiest. We would really miss seeing our family and friends this year, but if we don't get to see them, we'll try to make the best of it.

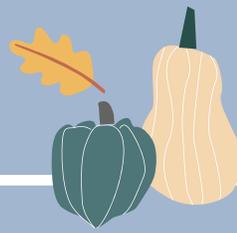

This year, I'll be especially grateful for the health of our friends and family. I lost a few tennis player friends to COVID-19, and it's hard to predict what else this insane year has in store for us. Those early morning moments of calm before anyone else is awake in the house are all the more precious this year.

Now more than ever, it's a good time to turn off your phone's notifications, ignore your social media apps and take a little time for some peace and quiet. If you've got a pen and paper handy, jot down what's on your mind, make a list of what you're thankful for, or maybe write down the names of some friends you haven't spoken to in a while. When you need a break from the craziness of daily life, grab that piece of paper and remind yourself what you're thankful for or give that friend a call — it will hopefully make their day that much brighter to hear from you!

ICE, ICE, LAWSUIT

Woman Sues Starbucks Over 'Too Much Ice'

Sometimes, there is such a thing as “too much ice.” You’re sipping your cold beverage when suddenly, it’s gone far quicker than you expected. All you’re left with is a cup full of ice. It’s disappointing, for sure, but is it so disappointing that you would want to file a lawsuit against the company that supplied the beverage?

That’s exactly what Stacy Pincus did in 2016. She ordered an iced coffee from Starbucks, only to find “too much ice” in her drink. The lawsuit, filed in Chicago, alleged that the drink was advertised as a 24-ounce beverage, but once the ice was factored in, Pincus and her lawyers claimed the drink was really only “14 fluid ounces.”

“Starbucks’ advertising practices are clearly meant to mislead consumers when combined with the standard practice of filling a cold drink cup with far less liquid than the cup can hold,” the suit claimed. NBC News reported that Pincus sought damages to the tune of $5 million against the coffee chain.

“The plaintiff would not have paid as much,” her lawyers stated in a court document, “if anything, for the cold drinks had she known that they contained less, and in many cases, nearly half as many, fluid ounces than claimed by Starbucks. As a result, the plaintiff suffered injury in fact and lost money or property.”

Starbucks’ response: “Our customers understand and expect that ice is an essential component of any ‘iced’ beverage. If a customer is not satisfied with their beverage preparation, we will gladly remake it.” The company also reaffirmed that you can order any iced beverage with “light ice” and receive half the ice normally included.

Interestingly, a second lawsuit against Starbucks popped up in Los Angeles a few months later, but both cases were thrown out. Pincus never saw a cent of that $5 million, nor did she recoup her attorneys’ fees. The case went on to be called “one of the most frivolous lawsuits of 2016.”

Election!

The Presidential Election of 1828 Turned Politics Personal

It’s election season! But don’t worry, we’re not here to talk about this election season, a season full of emotion, strong feelings, and plenty of mudslinging. Rather, this is a look back at one presidential election that upset an entire country — an election that makes 2020 look tame!

1828: Andrew Jackson vs. John Quincy Adams (Incumbent)

Two new political parties entered the scene: the Democratic Party and the National Republican Party. These parties were established following the dissolution of the Federalist Party and the Democratic-Republican Party just a few years prior.

Both Andrew Jackson and John Quincy Adams were formerly of the Democratic-Republican Party. However, Jackson joined the new Democratic Party, while Adams joined the National Republicans. After the split, historians note a newfound level of polarization in national politics. Politics had always been polarizing, but in 1828, things really heated up.

Jackson had already lost to Adams in 1824. That election ended with no candidate winning the majority of the electoral vote. As a result, Speaker of the House Henry Clay had to cast a tie-breaking vote. (Clay had also been a candidate for president in the 1824 election.) Clay sided with Adams. And then Adams appointed Clay his secretary of state. Naturally, Jackson was not happy and accused the two of corrupt bargaining.

Even Thomas Jefferson remarked on the events of 1824, writing that he was disappointed in the results. (He had supported William H. Crawford.) Even though Jefferson died in 1826, the Jackson and Adams campaigns used Jefferson’s words both to attack one other and praise themselves in the 1828 election.

Mudslinging defined the 1828 election with both Jackson and Adams making it personal. They started going after one another’s wives and families, which the newspapers at the time loved. The Cincinnati Gazette called Jackson’s wife, Rachel, a “convicted adulteress.” She was in the process of getting a divorce when she married Jackson; however, the divorce had not been finalized when the marriage took place in 1794. This became a talking point for the opposition.

It got to the point where Jackson gave up on talking about the issues and moved personal attacks to center stage. Adams tried to stick to the issues, more or less. However, the public sided with Jackson and Adams lost. But the drama didn’t end there. Days after the election, Rachel Jackson died. President-elect Jackson blamed her death on the mudslingers, saying, “May God Almighty forgive her murderers as I know she forgave them. I never can.”

MEDITATION ALTERNATIVES

For People Who Don't Like to Meditate

Meditation is lauded for its health benefits and is often suggested as an effective way to clear the mind, organize thoughts, and reduce stress. Realistically, however, it's not for everyone. In fact, some people don't experience any benefits at all from meditating.

In a recent study published in New Scientist about the effectiveness of meditation, researchers confirmed that some people do not benefit from meditation and that about 8% of people who try meditation experience an "unwanted effect," such as an increase in anxiety.

If you're not interested in meditation, or it just doesn't work for you, here are some alternative ways to clear your mind and reduce stress.

Get serious about physical activity. Aerobic exercises — like walking, jogging, running, cycling, and swimming — are great for clearing your mind and getting your body moving. Really, any exercise that gets the heart pumping and increases your respiratory rate will do. Research supports that aerobic exercise is a great alternative to meditation that yields many of the same benefits.

Exercising outdoors or in nature — especially in new places — enhances these benefits. Because your surroundings are going to be unfamiliar, your mind is more focused, which can help if you're searching for clarity.

Stay mentally engaged. Many people achieve clarity, focus, and stress reduction through simple but engaging tasks, such as immersing themselves in an adult coloring book, doing brain teasers, or assembling LEGO sets, which proves they can be effective therapeutic tools or alternatives to meditation. The LEGO Company has actually been developing more products for adults with this sort of research in mind.

But why LEGO products specifically? In addition to being objects you touch and push together, LEGO products come with clear, step-by-step instructions, which make them easy to put together and allow you to focus more on the task at hand. Even if you don't complete the piece in one sitting, working on a project a few minutes a day can be a beneficial way to find a little clarity.

CINNAMON-SPICED CANDIED SWEET POTATOES

These candied sweet potatoes will make your family beg for more!

Ingredients

THE 11TH HOUR OF THE 11TH DAY OF THE 11TH MONTH Why Veterans Day and the Number 11 Go Hand in Hand

Veterans Day comes every Nov. 11. It's a national holiday that recognizes veterans who served in the United States Armed Forces and honors those both living and deceased. Historically, the day marks Armistice Day and the end of the Great War: World War I. But what is the significance of the number 11?

The armistice was signed at 5:45 a.m. in France, but it took effect at 11 a.m. that same morning — which happened to be Nov. 11, 1918. The armistice originally lasted 36 days but was extended month after month. This led to the signing of the Treaty of Versailles on June 28, 1919, when peace was officially declared.

Later that year, President Woodrow Wilson proclaimed that Nov. 11 would be known as Armistice Day to honor those who fought in the Great War. This lasted until 1954, when President Dwight Eisenhower signed a proclamation turning Armistice Day into Veterans Day.

The change was made in order to recognize all veterans who had honorably served their country. By 1954, the U.S. had fought in more wars — specifically World War II and the Korean War — and hundreds of thousands more Americans had served.

Unsurprisingly, there was some political drama surrounding the day. In 1968, Congress made Veterans Day a federal holiday under the Uniform Holiday Bill. The idea was to increase the number of three-day weekends in the year. Veterans Day became a holiday that would fall on the fourth Monday of October, a far cry from Nov. 11.

However, in 1978, Veterans Day was restored to its original Nov. 11 date. But why?

The answer is simple. It's a number that sticks with you. When the clock strikes 11:11, you always take notice. By that same notion, we all remember the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month. Because of this, we'll never forget the end of the Great War, nor will we forget those who served.
